The Situation in Fiji.

[From the New Zealand Herald, March 14th] the opinion we expressed on receipt of the letter to King Cakobau from the Royal Commissioners. If there were any doubt as to the meaning of that letter there can be none as to the deliberate utterances of the Commodore and Consul at a public meeting convened by the Commissioners to state their views on the future government of the know the result at which they arrived. The Commissioners were anxious to do everything frankly and openly, for they felt very strongly that there had been a succession of surprises.

The final answer of the Imperial Government could not come for some time, be it what it might, and they trusted to the settlers keeping the peace in the interval. They had advised the

And as I go further my belief is strengthened."

He added how delighted he had been with the the land and variety and value of its productions.

Only confidence was required to insure the introduction of means for the development of the country's resources, and he hoped that all whom

It is unnecessary to go into the utterances of others at this important meeting, as they are interesting rather to residents than to those who take an interest in the future government of the group. There were about two hundred settlers present and they were unanimous in preferring a permanent officials. They were tired of the attempts at Constitutional Government in a community where the men who could be best trusted take an efficient part in those of the public. It must have been highly gratifying to the settlers to hear the Commissioners, after visiting the most outlying parts of the group and going over the plantations, express so high a sense of the order everywhere prevailing and their readiness to labor after seeing how well the imported men were everywhere treated. To those who know Fiji and the high character of the very great majority of its settlers, this effect of personal intercourse with the Commissioners will not be surprising. The contrary impression originated chiefly in a by-gone age when the whole of the white population consisted of a few score runaway sailors now dead or driven by the advance of civilization to other islands. It was due also to the erroneous notions of geography which make the Fijis responsible for barbarities committed in from New Zealand. The settlers must have felt, ings of English law, commerce, and civilization.

No wonder they valued highly the good opinion of the first independent and competent men who have had an opportunity of thoroughly investigating the affairs of the group, and meeting in their homes all classes of its settlers. The "three ringing cheers for the Queen, the three more for with which the meeting closed, must have come from the hearts of men who have seen themselves sorely villified and threatened with reduction under the government of an ignorant native King, claiming by inherent right to do with them and theirs as might seem best fitting to his Royal will
